ENSTİTÜSÜ

- The Public Health Master's and Doctoral Programs, affiliated with the Institute of Health Sciences, are conducted by the Department of Public Health, which is one of the internal disciplines of medical science.
- Public health is a scientific field that considers the individual together with their entire environment, viewing their health as a lifelong responsibility—from before birth until death. It focuses on eliminating adverse factors in the physical, biological, social, cultural, economic, and psychological environment that contribute to disease formation and on creating a positive environment. It also aims to identify and treat diseases at an early stage.
- It encompasses organized activities aimed at disease prevention, life extension, and health promotion.
- Within the programs, there are compulsory and elective courses covering topics such as basic and advanced epidemiology, biostatistics, health management, health manpower, maternal and child health, health education, health economics, reproductive health, occupational health, community nutrition, family planning, epidemiology of communicable diseases and outbreaks, school health, and interdisciplinary approaches in health services.
